Edge Sculpture

Presenting a most striking collection of contemporary sculpture.
Emotionally evocative, fiercely modern, yet remaining utterly affordable.

Designed and sculpted by Matt Buckley at his studios in Shropshire, Edge Sculpture is a collection influenced by style rather than subject. The mix of form, light and texture gives a unique feel to each individual piece. They are an eclectic mix of themes that have a collective 'look'.

Each sculpt has been originally sculpted from clay, which allows the sculptor to be freer, giving the pieces that dynamic and organic feel, stylised by Edge Sculpture. The finished clay sculpt 'masters' are then taken to be moulded, and each subsequent piece will be carefully hand-cast from this mould using marble polystone, which allows for the faithful reproduction of detail and texture applied to the original sculpt. The finishing touch is the skillful application of hand-painting and finishing, which brings the sculpt to life.

The end result is a centre-piece and talking point for anyone's living room!

Matt Buckley - Sculptor

How to Create a Masterpiece

Research & Design

This of course means any design can at most only be hinted at within the confines of a sketch and instead a piece really develops on the turntable alone, keeping the reference material down to a minimum and relying far more on the mind's eye as a source of aesthetic judgement.

Sculpting

To be able to evolve a sculpt with the energy and fluidity required means that a sturdy armature is needed. Its primary purpose is to have the strength to hold the weight of wet clay as it is violently formed into its desired shape with such purpose that leaves a deliberate rawness within the body of every piece. Of course the composition is incredibly important and the engineering paramount in order to make a figure that stands solidly and without weakness so that an appropriate thickness of clay can be maintained throughout.

Moulding

We pride ourselves in our ability to keep the integrity of the original clay sculpture alive so nothing is more important than the first rubber mould. To harness the sheer weight of material and avoid leakage we have to construct a very strong and perfectly sealed case to shroud the piece as closely as possible. Cut-lines are predetermined and appropriate bleeds are added to allow any trapped air to escape and only then can we begin to pour in the pre-vacuumed liquid rubber. Once the rubber has hardened the Mould is then skilfully cut allowing the removal of the now surplus clay sculpture.

Casting

A careful mix of marble resin is then patiently poured into the prepared master mould, which is then lowered into a vacuum chamber to aid the bleeding process to remove those unwanted air bubbles that still may otherwise reside within the casing. Once cured and properly hardened, the cast can be removed to reveal the first clean white sample.

Fettling, Sandblasting & Levelling

To prepare for painting a cleaning process begins where one of our ever diligent fettlers will eliminate any unwanted mould lines and undesirable casting residue using small speed adjustable drills, knives and sanding blocks. Any pieces made in several parts are then assembled using steel pins, resin and glue before being levelled and then finally sand-blasted in order to give it a slight key.

Painting & Finishing

The piece then finds its way back to the Design Studio in order to complete its journey through the development phase. The colour patterns are developed and the chosen hues applied until a Studio Master is created. This is ultimately the piece with which all subsequent production pieces are compared against, to maintain our excellent level of continuity.

Finally...The Masterpiece!

With what was once an idea now becoming reality we have the finished piece, a work of pride and a tribute to the Development Team.

"I shall never forget my first encounter with gorillas. Sound preceded sight. Odor preceded sound in the form of an overwhelming, musky-barnyard, humanlike scent. The air was suddenly rent by a high-pitched series of screams followed by the rhythmic rondo of sharp pok-pok chestbeats from a great silverbacked male obscured behind what seemed an impenetrable wall of vegetation."

by Dian Fossey

*In the calm of the night-time forest there is nary a sound.
The flapping wings of owls and bats,
The sighs of the trees as they sway in the wind.
Beneath the trees a wood elf lies,
Asleep and resting, her head filled with pleasant dreams.*

*I once saw a dog that looked kinda neat,
 Its chest was swung low and it had fat feet.
 Its nose was pushed in and it had really big eyes,
 It had a very little butt with some muscular thighs.
 Its ears were called rose and sat perky on its head,
 I could tell from the yawns it was on the way to bed.

Henry Fairfield Osborn, president of the American Museum of Natural History, named Tyrannosaurus rex in 1905. The generic name is derived from the Greek words tyrannos, meaning "tyrant" and sauros, meaning "lizard". Osborn used the Latin word rex, meaning "king", for the specific name. The full binomial therefore translates to "tyrant lizard the king" or "King Tyrant Lizard", emphasizing the animal's size and perceived dominance over other species of the time.
